

Upon hearing that the FCC is considering lessening Indiana's Telephone Privacy law, I felt compelled to comment. Since being on the "no call" list, the number of phone calls has decreased dramatically. I receive perhaps one to two calls a month compared to four to five calls a week before the Privacy law. Dinner time at home is much more pleasant when we, as a family, can sit down together and discuss the day instead of answering the phone, and promptly hang up when it is a solicitation. As an early riser, I go to bed fairly early. I am not awakened by the phone ringing due to a telemarketer trying to sell me something. Again, I urge the FCC not to lessen the Indiana Telephone Privacy law. Why fix something that is working so well??
